There can be no doubt that in the 21st century science and theology continue to be dominant forces in our culture. What is less obvious is how these two fields of human endeavour relate to one another. In much popular culture science and theology are presented as antagonists. However, historically science and theology have often been seen as partners in the quest for knowledge and truth. In this course we will consider different models for conceiving the relationship between science and theology. We will also give attention to some of the big topics that science and theology address such as the God-world relationship, creation and cosmology, the nature of divine action, creation and evolution. We will be introduced to some fascinating scientists and theologians who have committed themselves to advancing the cause of both fields of human endeavour within the context of a postmodern society.
